NINETEEN YEARS AGO

Someone had built Emmie's house in two sections, and she loved it. Her family occupied the front half and all the upstairs bedrooms. Frankie and his mom lived in the lower-back half. Two sandwiched doors separated their areas, and when their parents opened them, allowing them to run freely between the two sections, it was like a portal into another world.

The doors were open now, and Frankie ran into his part of the house gripping the pack of cards. He stopped to play the game, pulling one card from the deck and covering it with his palm.

Emmie paused. "The Hermit."

Frankie flipped the card over and stared at it. He looked up at Emmie through narrow eyes. "You cheated."

"I didn't cheat. That's ridiculous."

"You can't guess it right every time."

"Why not?"

HANGING HOUSE

TV stand. He turned her toward the wall and stepped back. "You can't see me now, can you?"

"No, I see a wall." And some cracks and a spider web.

"Okay, good, now don't you dare peek."

"Fine."

Frankie rushed away, and the echoes of his feet pounding across the hardwood floors echoed through the house until they faded to muffled thumps. Emmie began the count from ten to one.

Even without her Third Eye, she still knew where he would go. Down to the basement. But after he reached the bottom of the stairs, she lost the thumping of his feet.

She tried not to see him. She really did. It was more fun that way. She avoided shutting her eyes for longer than a blink, when her Third Eye would reveal his location as a blurry image of light against the blackness of her eyelids. She would play fair and not see him this time. Play the game like everyone else. Like a normal kid.

When she finished counting down from ten to one, she took off toward the basement, charging through the house with her heart pounding. She stomped down the stairs, pausing a moment on the last step to listen for any sounds of Frankie. The cool basement air invigorated her after playing upstairs for so long.

Larger, but not empty. She looped around stacks of boxes, discarded items and old toys. She paused. "I know you're down here."

No sound from Frankie. She looked behind a stack of red plastic totes labeled "Christmas stuff" and hurried into a small room her dad used to store his "souvenirs." Shelves displayed the many creepy figurines, pentagrams, wooden masks, photos, devil's heads, skulls, and a Ouija board. All the items she wasn't allowed to play with unless she asked. She never asked.

She glanced inside. Not many places to hide in there, and one
